Comments for Public Posting: I think you should make sure everyone who was proven to be eligible in this round gets some kinda cannabis license and opportunity for a better life. I for one was locked in a cage for months on end for my love of a plant. Now the only people I see who own anything in the industry fall into one of a few categories: don't care about cannabis but have rich parents and are greedy so they got into it, real estate investors who are greedy, corporate cannabis backed by venture capital (greedy), and people who blatantly broke the rules during the medical years growing 100x more plants than they were supposed to and are now being rewarded for it because they can afford the insane cost of a cannabis startup. The people like me with a passion and who followed the rules during medical years are being offered jobs working for the people mentioned above (because most don't know a damn thing about cultivation, extraction, or retail) at 60k a year to run their business for them. This is just another injustice atop of injustice. Im supposed to run an extraction labratory that is making 800k per month net for $3800 per month??? Really?? Thats is what I call economic slavery at its finest. The only way out of poverty is to own things generally real estate or businesses. I for one would prefer to have a manufacturing license over any retail license and I think if we added some additional license to this everybody could get something instead of a lucky few ending up with all and the rest get none. I wanted to get a manufacturing license from the last round but did not hear about the program in time to apply. I have tons of industry experience and would love to have a shot at getting that instead of just some delivery license that will only bring me a few grand a month. Besides, I'm passionate about this and that makes all the difference.
