Comments for Public Posting: In the same way that not everyone gets to be an astronaut, not every building gets to be a Historic Cultural Monument. The chili/sushi bowl building is a case in point. Historical preservation is an important element of city planning, but the Historic Cultural Monument process should not be abused as a tool for 'nimby' obstruction, especially when the proposed project will provide badly needed housing.

Comments for Public Posting: I've read the arguments against historic/cultural designation of this building in favor instead of its destruction for so-called affordable housing. I feel it bears mentioning the trend that's occurred at three locations involving the incorporation of original architectural element into new development, namely the old Algemac Coffeeshop on San Fernando Road and the original Fatburger stand on Western Avenue, and the old Spaghetti Factory on Sunset Boulevard. Make no mistake, I urge support of the Chili Bowl building's nomination as a historic/cultural monument, but if that is not to be than at least consider mandating the design of any proposed development in its place INCLUDE the structure rather than allow its destruction.

Comments for Public Posting: Please landmark the Chili Bowl. It seems the city is losing another institution every day. Losing this one would be terrible for this great city and its history.

Comments for Public Posting: Hello, I'm writing in support of the Historic-Cultural Monument (HCM) designation of the Chili Bowl shaped building on Pico Blvd. in West Los Angeles. Please vote to send this to the full City Council. Southern California has been a fun place with fun things and fun places for a very long time, many of those have already vanished so keeping or helping to save one that has a unique and cool history is important to me. Please do what you can to keep this building as is and where it is. Thank you

Comments for Public Posting: Dear PLUM, I support the landmark nomination for the Chili Bowl, and ask PLUM to send this nomination to full City Council for a landmarking vote. There is nothing like this building in the entire city. If there was ever a case for preserving a structure and history, THIS IS ONE OF THEM. Thank you. J. Courshon

Comments for Public Posting: Our community has weighed in:. We need to preserve our architectural history and responsibly preserve, conserve and safeguard the Chili Bowl. We must ensure it is protected and preserved to the highest degree of quality, to the strictest standards. Councilmembers, your priority must be to the community, not the self serving interests of developers who build disposable structures that destroy the integrity and social cohesiveness of neighborhoods and the architectural and cultural history of List Angeles. Responsibly repurpose the Chili Bowl but save, protect, restore and preserve it first!

Comments for Public Posting: There is significant value to preserving old buildings in Los Angeles. If city planners continue to demolish old buildings, the sense of connection to the city's past will be destroyed too. There are many culturally and architecturally unique buildings in Los Angeles that represent the city's cultural heritage. Thus, it is in the public interest to preserve historic buildings as a legacy of the past, so they can continue to enrich the cultural and historic heritage of current and future generations. Instead of destroying the Chili Bowl, could the city planners and developers consider incorporating the building into the design of the new residential building? For example, rehabilitating the building to make it compatible with the new structure while preserving the historical, cultural, or architectural features of the existing building?

Comments for Public Posting: The 1935 Chili Bowl structure on Pico Boulevard is an exceptionally rare and one of the oldest surviving examples of programmatic architecture in Los Angeles. This is a place that is valued and loved by many Angelenos who wish to see it preserved. I urge the PLUM to vote to send it to full City Council. Please save this landmark structure! Thank you.
