Comments for Public Posting: More than a 100 pedestrians and cyclists die in Los Angeles every year and more are seriously injured. Children and the elderly are especially vulnerable. Reducing speed limits, especially in areas prone to collisions, such as the High Injury Network, is one of the most effective ways to make streets safer for all. We must act now to help save lives and make walking and cycling safer in Los Angeles.

Comments for Public Posting: In Los Angeles, speeding cars are out of control and a public safety threat to us all, including those that drive them. I am very happy that the city is moving towards implementation of AB-43, and looking to reduce speed limits wherever possible. Please support this council file and move as quickly as possible in lowering speed limits!

Comments for Public Posting: I write as a bus rider, pedestrian, and mother of a small child here in Los Angeles. Speeding cars are out of control and a public safety threat to us all, including those who drive them. A mother and child were hit three weeks ago next to my son's elementary school, at the same intersection where my child and I also were nearly hit. I am very happy that the city is moving toward implementation of AB-43, and looking to reduce speed limits wherever possible. Please support this council file and move as quickly as possible in lowering speed limits!

Comments for Public Posting: I primarily get around my neighborhood on foot, and unfortunately close calls with cars speeding through intersections even though fellow pedestrians and I have the walk sign is an almost daily occurrence. Watching the local news on any given day is often a listing of all the horrible crashes that occurred that day, often resulting in destruction of property, or worse; grim injuries or death. It is no secret that speeding drivers are out of control and a public safety threat to all Angelenos, including the drivers themselves who occasionally fall victim to their own recklessness. I'm relieved to hear the city is moving towards implementation of AB-43 in order to rein in reckless driving by reducing speed limits wherever possible. Please support this council file and move as quickly as possible in lowering speed limits and increasing safety in our neighborhoods.
