Comments for Public Posting: I've lived for over 30 years in Hollywood, and seen the proliferation of unaffordable housing rise around me, along with the explosion of unhoused people on my streets. If congregations of faith want to help ease this pain, they should be given as much help as they can, especially since they can also provide the residents with hope and emotional support. Streamlining the process will incentivize this process by saving churches thousands of dollars. If you remove the incentives to build affordable housing, on church property, you can't claim to be serious about solving this real crisis. Angelenos have made it clear that the housing crisis needs to be addressed, and this is a no-brainer. Please represent our interests and support the incentives in place, to help our fellow citizens and our churches.

Comments for Public Posting: Please don't reverse the Council's support for building affordable housing on the property of religious organizations! More affordable housing is vital if Los Angeles is to reduce homelessness – and this cannot be done without some new spaces opened up for affordable housing to be built. Creating new opportunities for faith-based organizations to build such housing on property that FBO's own is a win/win. We have been thrilled by what we have understood to be the LA City Council's support for these efforts – and are shocked at the possibility that the council would continue to put up or keep up the barriers to addressing the number one solution to our city's homelessness crisis - affordable housing. And to add to today's agenda at the last moment---election day----rather disgusting. guess you are hoping no one is paying attention. shame on you.
