Comments for Public Posting: The city of LA continues to honor a man who committed one of the greatest atrocities this country has seen, even years and months after the fact. Today, this man posted a picture of himself holding a baseball bat as if in mid-swing, edited next to one of Alvin Bragg, D.A. and looking in his direction. Not just in bad taste -everything this horror does is a dog whistle to his base of deplorables. I understand that the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce is bending the rules for this traitor. If the only way you can get tourists to come to your city, are to honor a man that loves Hitler and Russia and sexually assaulting women while lusting after his 13-year-old daughter, you got problems, man. The trump star should be removed. Put Martin Lawrence's star there; Get rid of the orange traitor altogether. Now, put in Carrie Fisher's star, one that should have been on the Walk long, LONG before the orange baboon was ever considered. Fisher was not only a legendary actress, she also was a strong advocate for mental health - unlike 'the don', who makes fun of it. She let us know that it was not our fault to be mentally ill, and that it is okay to take meds for it as well. She showed us what fighters and survivors we could be. She used her fame for good, rather than evil (like trump). And she did this for _decades_. In her last advice column at The Guardian, she wrote this to a teenage girl who had written for advice on her recent diagnosis of bipolar disorder: "Think of it as an opportunity to be heroic — not 'I survived living in Mosul during an attack' heroic, but an emotional survival," she wrote. "An opportunity to be a good example to others who might share our disorder. That's why it's important to find a community — however small — of other bipolar people to share experiences and find comfort in the similarities." The location of her opposite, vile trump's star, can be found in file 06-3258.
