Comments for Public Posting: I really believe every neighborhood in LA deserves the same kind of help when we call for it. Programs like CIRCLE and UMCR have already shown that sending trained, unarmed responders to handle non-violent crises actually works — it keeps people safe, builds trust, and frees up police to focus on real emergencies. But right now, whether you get that kind of help depends on where you live. That shouldn't be the case. If something happens to you or your loved ones, you should know the right kind of help is coming — not an armed response to something that doesn't need it. This citywide program is just common sense. It's about compassion, safety, and using our resources wisely. Let's expand it, fund it, and make it available in every part of Los Angeles. Because when we all have access to the right kind of help, the whole city gets stronger.
