Comments for Public Posting: Hello! There are multiple trends that seem to be echoing in the news. Animal surrenders are up nationwide, people are abandoning said animals because of housing, and many animals are needlessly dying. I understand homelessness is an important point of your campaign but is it fair to only extend that to humans? While insanity I'm sure, could there ever be a future where reasonable pet allowances are in every building or people don't have to worry about eviction over interspecies bonds? Right now the cost of living has made everyone feel that each other and non-human lives are burdens and that is so unfair. The survival of a domestic pet is reliant on the capital of the human that owns it, and how is that to treat a life? I'm not saying someone should cram 5 cats in a studio, but please do not forget about your non-human constituents as well. I do not have any friends and family and my cats are all I have. If for some reason the stability in my life collapsed because of a lack of support or the state of the world reached to me and I had to separate myself from my cats, I could not go on. Thank you.
